THE COWBOY EARL.

Called Nobility of England.

Chlengo Herald. The death of the earl of Aylesford, which is announced, closes a career that has been anything but a successwhich is announced, closes a career that has been anything but a successful or honorable one. As the heir of the Aylesford estates, this young man early in life took a conspicuous position among the royalty and nobility of England. He was a companion of the prince of Wales in most of his youthful escapades, and accompanied that worthy to India. On his return, Aylesford was married to one of the most beautiful and amisble young ladies in the kingdom, the daughter of a member of parliament not of the nobility. For a time the young earl abandoned his svil associates, but he returned to them again. His wife then fell under the influence of the disreputable marquis of Biandford, now the duke of Mariborough, and finally eloped with him to Paris, living with him there for years as his wife.

This and financial misfortunes seem to have sobered Aylesford. He brought suit for divorse, and would have been gives an unqualified decree if his own record could have been made to appear less repulsive. An order of separation was granted and Aylesford was enjoined to pay his wife a sum of money each year so long as she refrained from "molesting" him. After this unhappy scandal his great estate passed into the hands of a conservator, and taking an annuity of $50.

worse than motherless children, and, returning to this country, he an-nounced that henceforth this would be his home. He built a comfortable boose on his great Texas estate and bonse on his great Texas estate and lived there like any other cattle-raises, surrounded by the restless cowboyls and rangers, who were always his friends and with whom ha seemed ever at case. He banished himself deliberately from the home of his ancestors and apparently sated with discipation and broken with sorrow sought lorgetfulness in the wild free life of the border. His death at the age of thirty-five was no doubt hastened by the foellah excesses of which he had been guilty. His old companion in vice, the more stolid and phiesmatic, Albert Edward of Wales, has sobered down in time perhaps to insure himself long life, and while Aylesfard sleeps in a dishonored grave he will be king of England.

dishonored grave he will be king of England.
THE EARL OF AYLESFORD'S WIDOW.
LONDON, Jan. 14—The sudden death of the earl of Aylesford, at his ranch in Texas, causes much comment and speculation here. He spent three months in England last year, and signalized his visit by a row at a railway station, during which he had a leg broken, and by the sale of his country estates at Aylesford, near Maldenatone, in Kent. Lady Aylesford left his home in 1870 for the protection of the marquis of Blandford, who is now the dune of Mariborough. People in society are now discussing the probabilities of the duke of Mariborough fulfilling the solemn pledge which he made to Lady Aylesford some years ago, to make her his legal wife as soon as possible. She excused her conduct in accepting Lord Blandford's protection on the plea that life was intolerable with Lord Aylesford, and that Lord Blandford and promised to marry her as soon. Lord Aylesford, and that Lord Bland-Lord Aylesford, and that Lord Bland-ford had promised to marry her assoon as she could get a divorce. Now that Lord Aylesford has been re-moved by death, it remains to be that Lord Aylesford has been removed by death, it remains to be seen whether the duke of Mariberough will fulfill the promise he made eight years ago and has frequently renewed. Many people who are well acquainted with the character and resord of the young duke do not believe that he will be man enough to redeem his pledge, and that he never meant to make Lady Aylesford his duchess. The prince of Wales, who was a boon companion of Lord Aylesford and aponsor for the younger of his two daughters, is said to be much affected by the carl's sudden death.
